Asks Non-Zionist Aid in Palestine

Co-operation of all Jews, whether Zionist or non-Zionist, in the upbuilding of Palestine as the Jewish homeland was urged by Louis Lipsky, of New York, chairman, in his opening address, June 28, at the annual convention of the Zionist Organization of America in Washington, D.C.

To this end, Mr. Lipsky said, the delegates should strongly support the proposal for extension of the Jewish Agency provided by the Palestine mandate to co-operate in the Palestine movement, to include both Zionists and non-Zionists. The World Zionist Organization is now designated as the agency, and the question of changing the basis of its membership to include half Zionists and half non-Zionists is to come up for final action at the Vienna World Zionist Congress in August.

"Unloved" Land Reclaimed

The chairman's views on the question supported the petition of Dr. Chaim Weizmann, president of the World Zionists, who sent a message to the convention urging extension of the agency and declaring Jews throughout the world were closely watching to see what action American Zionists would take on the question. The message also expressed confidence that Lord Plumer, the recently appointed High Commissioner of Palestine, would "faithfully observe the letter and spirit of the Mandate."

Describing the work of the new Jewish settlers in Palestine since the war, Mr. Lipsky declared they have "made a land unloved and disused, that had been treated as if God's curse rested upon it, into a land that begins to shower the blessings upon those who labour upon it."

Jewish Population Doubles

The convention heard a report from Col. Frederick H. Kisch, of the Palestine Zionist executive, showing the Jewish population in Palestine 110,000, already having doubled since the war. The migration of Jews there now has increased to more than 2,000 a month.

Greater credit facilities to relieve acute land and housing crisis resulting from the rapid Jewish influx was declared by Col. Kisch to be one of the chief needs of Palestine, although the situation was being improved, he said, by an increase in the number of more prosperous settlers.

Although expressing gratification at the general progress achieved in Palestine in the past year, the annual report of the Administrative Committee of the organization regarded the "slow pace" of the British Mandate authorities in certain administrative matters as having tended to "disturb the development of normal conditions."

Einstein Sends Message

Messages were read from Zionist leaders throughout the world, including Prof. Albert Einstein, of Berlin and Philip Guerdalli, president of the English Zionist Federation.

J. Joyce Broderick, counsellor of the British Embassy, in conveying to the convention the greetings of Ambassador Howard, who is in England, declared Great Britain can be relied upon to carry out fully its pledge to re-establish the Jewish homeland in Palestine.

While there may be a "natural sense of impatience that events do not march more rapidly in Palestine," he said, in view of what has been accomplished in the last few years, such impatience is "really not justified by the facts."

"I feel confident," Mr. Broderick added, "that the difficulties which naturally present themselves to the accomplishment of all you desire, will be quickly overcome. At all events, I may say that insofar as the British Government can accomplish that, they will be quickly overcome."

Now—your stockings—sheer and delicate—can be made to last

How to wash silk stockings:

Skip a spoonful of Lux into foamy lather. Press suds through and through soiled parts. Rinse in three lukewarm waters, then squeeze water out—do not wring. When nearly dry, press with warm iron. Always wash coloured silks quickly, in lukewarm water.

Lever Brothers Limited, Toronto

Silk is an animal fibre, more sensitive than the skin on your face, because it has not the skin's power of renewing itself. Even a soap that is safe for the face, might not be quite fine or mild enough for those gossamer-like weaves with their lovely new colours.

Wash your stockings in Lux after every wearing. Gently press the foamy suds through and through them. This frees them from perspiration—that deadly enemy to silk and to colours.

Lux contains no harmful ingredients of any kind. It is so pure and mild it will safely cleanse anything that water alone won't harm.

Among several chapters of "Liberalizing Liberal Judaism," the book by James Waterman Wise, setting forth the inadequacies of Liberal Judaism, of which resumés will be given here, is the one on "Religious Education for Jewish Children." The writer's argument for abolishing the ceremony of confirmation makes this essay an outstanding one and the reforms advocated in it are worth a hearing if for no more than their intrinsic interest.

Mr. Wise divides Jewish children to be considered into three classes. To the first belong the children of parents who themselves are not vitally interested in the synagogue and take little interest in the religious education of their children. To the second class belong the children of those who have no synagogal interests but who want religious education for their children in the hope that the children may derive some benefit. To the third class which Mr. Wise says is growing proportionally smaller, belong the children of parents who insist that their religious faith be taught to their children. The problem which the writer sees is not how to bring the children of the uninterested under the influence of Jewish religious education, but rather what shall be taught those children already under its influence.

The author agrees with most modern Jewish teachers that the child must be taught Judaism first, that is, Jewish customs, beliefs, history and ethics. The child should begin with the Bible as the basis of Judaism, not only because the Bible is bound up with the history and culture of mankind, but because on the part of the Jew there should be a peculiarly intimate feeling for its teachings. It is to the present manner of teaching the Bible that Mr. Wise objects because it is taught too much for the sake of the Bible and not enough for the child's sake. Its teachings should be fitted to the child's comprehension instead of vice versa, and the greatest defect in religious education is the fact that the Bible is forced on the child and religion made a prescription the same for all.

An important thing in the religious education of any child, Jew or Gentile, is that it be taught an understanding of faiths other than its own. To teach the child Jewish history and ethics is just half the problem; it must learn other viewpoints if it is to learn tolerance; only by being tolerant itself can it ask tolerance for itself and take part in the task of ending race and religious hatred.

Upon the question of confirmation, Mr. Wise dwells in scathing criticism, urging that it be abolished and be replaced by graduation exercises which call, not for confession of faith, but merely for a record of proficiency in studies. He points to the absurdity of asking children of fourteen or fifteen for a solemn declaration of loyalty to Judaism and scores religious teachers for encouraging children, far too young to decide other important questions, to pledge lifelong allegiance to God and Judaism.

The author says that not only is confirmation at that age "a violation of the sacredness of childhood," but also that "public confirmation at any age is opposed to the innate spirit of religion; confirmation of the spirit should be made in silence and alone." The child can be made to feel that "the inner faith is not a thing to be broadcast in a parade of two minute 'confessions' designed chiefly to titillate the sentimentality of admiring relatives and friends." Given a chance the child will be willing to do away with the trappings and show of religious exercises because they emphasize ostentation in religion, says the author. He questions whether as much can be said of the elders.

In the withdrawal of a libel suit against Eleazer Rogozin, of Brooklyn, N.Y., involving $400,000, there ended a lesson administered to a rabbi.

Several months ago Rabbi Rogozin issued pamphlets in which he charged Rabbi Aaron Teitlebaum, executive secretary of the Central Relief Committee, Leon Kamaiky, publisher of the Jewish Daily News; Rabbi Israel Rosenberg, president of the Union of Hebrew Orthodox Rabbis, and others, with misappropriation of funds collected during and after the war. The rabbi was given a chance to appear before the rabbinical association and show proof of his charges. When he refused to do this he was arrested and later released under $2,500 bail. It was not until the matter was brought to court that Rabbi Rogozin withdrew his charges in a signed statement which said that he had been in error.

The rabbi deserved the humiliation he received, for all his seventy years. Perhaps when he first resorted to penny-press methods of libel he scouted the idea of any serious outcome for a rabbi. To any others labouring under a similar delusion Rogozin's case will serve as an example and a warning that a minister is no better than a layman when he violates the law.

The Sinner

(Hadassah)

"And on Rosh Hashonah the Lord of Life sits by the great book and tells the Recording Angel the names to write down; the good are written down for life, the bad for death, and very bad have until Yom Kippur to repent, for the book is kept open until then." So spoke grandfather, his white beard tossed by the light September breeze, his dim, gray, sunken eyes fixed far away on the stars just coming out overhead.

The evening life of the small city flowed past them, as they sat before the little shoemaker's shop on the main street of the small city. Grandfather was very old. "Most a million!" explained 7-year-old Max, when the question of grandfather's age came into discussion among the children on the street.

Then Rosie, so much older at 12, would chide Max and carefully explain that he was really only 76, but that suffering in the old home across the sea had made him seem so old. But together they would sit with him by the hour, listening to his tales of life in Eastern Europe, of Talmud lore and Old World folk tales.

But now Rosie sat downcast, her eyes wide and frightened. The hand that slipped into grandfather's was cold and trembling.

"Grandfather," she whispered, "is every one who did a sin written down for death?"

Grandfather shook his head judiciously. "Who can say—God is the Judge—He sees righteously. If one truly repents, and tries to make good what he has done, he is given a chance."

"To make good? What do you mean?" she quavered, anxiously.

"If one steals, all must be given back!" He stroked her brown curls tenderly. "If one has grieved another, he must ask forgiveness. Each one knows his own sin."

"But some things, grandfather, you can't make good! They didn't hurt any one else. What do you do then?" There were tears in her voice. The old man put his arm around her.

"Are you a 'yeshibah bochur' that you ask such questions? What have you to do with sin? Would my soul was as spotless! Let sinners worry. You—you will be written down for life; run away now—and play! It is not well for little people to think so deeply."

Quietly Rosie stole away, but not to play. She sat by the little upper window, watching how one by one the stars came out—how quickly the moon held her place among them—how still the air was. True, children were playing on the street, and then came a rumble of the early evening traffic—but she was not a part of the little world below—she was a sinner, and on Rosh Hashonah she was to be written down for death!

The tears came and she sobbed softly. Who would dry her mother's dishes—and mother wasn't strong! Who would take Max to school, Max, who was careless on the car tracks? Who would do her father's errands in the little shop? Surely he could not afford to pay a boy!

"Rosie!" came a call from below. "Go now with them things to Rebbe Levy—only just now came the herring he wants. Like a good girl, go!"

Like a good girl she went, not daring to come into the light for fear some one would see her misty eyes. Rebbe Levy only lived around the corner, and she loved to go there. But to-night she did not want to meet his keen old eyes—he was wise—perhaps he would see through her soul! How would he feel when he knew the sin there! He always kissed her forehead and called her "Rosele"—he would never do that again when he knew!

The Rebbe was not at home—so the Rebbetzin said. He had studied long that day and was tired and so had gone for a walk. Always at this season of the year so many people came to him to ask questions about this and about that—to find out if one might eat a certain chicken, to determine the degree of guilt one had and the fitting penance—all manner of things they asked. And often he had read hours in his big books in order to answer.

"It says about sins in his big books?" asked Rosie, wistfully.

"About sins?" the Rebbetzin echoed. "About everything. Is it not the law and the sayings of the rabbis—their names be blessed? Any question he can answer. He is a Rebbe! Such a one as those who are known for a thousand miles in the old country!"

"He is out?" A sudden surge of daring swept through Rosie's soul. "I am sorry!"

"Nu, come to-morrow." The fat little Rebbetzin smiled down on her. "Always he says Rosele is a fine little girl. See, here is a seed cake."

But the usually tempting seed cake was untasted, and she gave it to Max, who ate it greedily. What was the matter with Rosie, anyway? Who gives away a perfectly good seed cake?"

All night long Rosie tossed about her narrow little bed. Over and over again she said all the prayers she knew; she said the "Shema" on each finger, as some say prayers on beads; she recited the Ten Commandments, and when she could remember no more, said softly over and over again, "Forgive me! Forgive me! Don't write me down for death!"

When the gray light of dawn was creeping into her window, she fell asleep. It seemed only a few moments later when her mother awakened her. "Rosie, get up! You'll be late for school, Rosie!" Then she felt the pale cheeks and noted the feverish eyes. "Rosie, don't you feel good? Does your head ache?"

Her head did ache, she said, but she would go to school. No, her throat was not sore. But she didn't want any breakfast. She had to be at school very early—she had to study. Her mother shook her head as Rosie ran out the store door, her books under her arm, an hour before school could possibly open.

But it was to Rebbe Levy's house that Rosie went, rushing up the narrow stairs, bursting breathlessly into the little kitchen where Rebbe and Rebbetzin were having their morning coffee.

"Rebbe Levy, Oh, Rebbe Levy!" She threw herself upon him and burst into deep, wracking sobs.

"What is it?" He started to his feet. "Rosele, what is it? Who is sick? Tell me, what do you want?"

Word by word, in between choking sobs, Rosie asked her questions. "Rebbe Levy, in your books you can find out everything. The Rebbetzin said so! Dear Rebbe Levy, look it up—what does it say? Will I be written down for death? When the Angel writes in the book, will I be written down so? Honest, Rebbe Levy, I didn't mean to do it! I didn't know! Won't God understand? I said all the prayers I know and I am afraid, Rebbe Levy! If I am written down for death, who will take Maxie across the car tracks when he goes to school? And I have to help my mother all the time, 'cause she ain't strong. Tell Him not to put me down so, Rebbe Levy! Maybe He'll believe you that I didn't do it on purpose!"

The old man held her close and waited for the agonized sobbing to die away. "Rosele," he murmured, "little Rosele! Who has frightened little Rosele? What child of Israel talks like this? Stop crying, Rosele!"

Slowly the crying stopped, and with wet, frightened eyes she looked up at him. "It's awful to do a sin, Rebbe Levy! I know it. But I didn't mean to. And now it's soon Rosh Hashonah—and the Book will be open—and—" The sobs threatened to begin again. The Rebbe Levy spoke, tenderly, but sternly:

"Rosele, whom did you kill?"

She looked up hastily. "Oh, Rebbe Levy, I didn't kill anyone!"

"Nu, how much money did you steal?" He smoothed the wet curls from her forehead.

"I, Rebbe Levy! Steal?" There was horror in her tones.

"Nu, you didn't murder, and you didn't steal! Tell me, Rosele, what did you do?" The Rebbetzin leaned forward to listen, clicking her lips and tongue pityingly.

Slowly, Rosie lifted her eyes, then let them fall. "I—I—ate—trefa!"

"Trefa? Nu, you ate trefa! Are you the only one? And how did you come to eat trefa?" Was there a bit of a smile in his faded old eyes?

"A girl in school gave me a sandwich." The words came huskily. "And she said Jennie Leibowitz gave it to her—that it was veal. And afterwards she told me—that it was pork—and she laughed! And no one knows—not my mother neither. And grandfather said how some are written down for life—and some for death—and—"

"Rosele!" The old man took her little hands in his. "When one does not do a wrong purposely, it is no sin! The sin belongs to the one who fooled you! And does the Holy One, blessed be He, write down the names of the children, who know not what they do? Nay. Be comforted, you have no sin!"

"Am I sure? She asks me! Am I, or am I not, the Rebbe, Rosele?" And he laughed. And the Rebbetzin brought in fresh coffee and hard little rolls covered with poppy seeds, and sweet butter. And Rosie found herself eating, and once she smiled, rather tearfully, at the Rebbe's joke.

Then the Rebbetzin filled her pockets with little seed cakes, and Rosie and Rebbe Levy went back to Rosie's house, although Rosie said she had to go to school. But the Rebbe had his way, and then he told the whole story to mother and father and grandfather, and said some stern things about little people who think too much. Rosie wondered if she were being scolded, but mother cried, and grandfather put his hands on her head and said he knew she'd be the mother of Rebbes.

Then the Rebbe said that the early frost had caused the trees to turn most beautifully down by the little creek that flowed by the town. And he and grandfather and Max and Rosie were going to take a walk there and see—they'd just forget school and go walking and eat seed cakes.

And Rosie danced happily and said she didn't mind now that Rosh Hashonah was coming—she wasn't afraid. And with one hand in Rebbe Levy's and the other in grandfather's she went out to read God's handwriting in the autumn leaves.

How "Rosey" the Junkman Made a Fortune

Twelve years ago, a junkman, known as "Rosey" in the back alleys and vacant lots of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, assisted his decrepit horse to pull a wagon loaded down with iron, bones, bottles and rags. With six little tots and a wife at home, Rosey had to hustle for a living.

Recently this same Rosey sailed for Cuba and South American ports on a pleasure jaunt, booked as Morris Roseman, head of "The House of a Million Parts," and founder of "Rosey's Graveyard."

"I can't read or write," said Roseman, "but I have made a fortune out of automobile wrecks. I've handled over five thousand cars, and never lost a penny on one of them, except the first three cars, which gave me my big idea. I'm still Rosey, the junkman, and proud of it."

Roseman, whose financial rating is close to half a million dollars, conducts one of the largest businesses of its kind in the United States. But he does not even keep books. He pays his bills in cash and receives cash for sales.

During his career as a street junkman, Roseman accumulated thirty-five dollars. One day a butcher called his attention to a worn-out automobile, which, incidentally, had traveled from Maine to California seven times and from Canada to Lancaster more than eight times. It was a piece of junk on wheels.

Roseman decided to take a flier, and bought the car, expecting to make a profit of fifteen dollars. However, the deal did not go through as expected, and at the end of two weeks he sold the car at a loss of seventeen dollars and fifty cents.

"I had to come back," said Roseman, "so I bought another old automobile for seventy-three dollars, on borrowed money. I thought sure I would make something on this deal; but I had to sell it at a loss of thirty-five dollars.

Then Roseman began to do some thinking. He was out fifty-two dollars and fifty cents as a result of the deals. One night he told "Mama" Roseman that he would put his team away forever and tackle another line of the junk business. He explained to her, cannot be kept pure and wholesome without ice—at any time of the year. In cool weather such foods are exposed to dust and air that contains bacteria of many kinds. In warm weather, bacterial growth results naturally, and quickly robs food of much of its health value, even before there are any signs of spoilage.

Perishable Foods

The safe way—the sensible way is to keep all of your perishable foods in a well-iced refrigerator all the year around.

Dedication of St. Catharines Synagogue

The new Jewish synagogue at Church and Calvin Streets, St. Catharines, was formally dedicated with an appropriate service, attended by hundreds of Jews and also Gentiles. The ceremonials were preceded by a service held in the basement of the new edifice where the privilege of purchasing the key to the front door went to Mr. Burger, of Toronto, for $150. Mrs. Morris contributed $50 for the privilege of opening the door. Other amounts paid for the privilege of opening doors were Messrs. Goldblatt, Hamilton, $50; Oscar Taube, $45; Mrs. Newman, $50; Mr. Ubberman, $55; Welland Hebrew Club, $55. Each of these persons was presented with a silver key. The honour of carrying the Torah in the cars was secured by Messrs. Wright, Zett, Greenberg, Andrews, M. Zett, Steinberg. Honour seats in the cars were secured by Messrs. Hero, Katman, Freiman, Nash, Reichman, Burger, P. Cooperman, J. Cooperman, Goldberg, M. Shuman and Goldberg. Headed by the St. Catharines Concert Band, the parade proceeded from the synagogue to Queenston Street, to Geneva, to Church, returning to the synagogue. The band was followed by little girls dressed in white with a blue sash; the motor cars bringing up the rear. The girls formed a guard of honour on the church steps and while the band played, the assembly sang Hatikvah. Rabbi Iser L. Freund, of Hamilton, spoke on the survival of the Jewish race and the place of synagogue in Jewish life. He congratulated the local community upon the erection of the synagogue, especially on the fact that a handful of people representing only forty-five families, had been able to erect such a beautiful edifice during such depressed times. The speaker pointed to the need of education of the children and urged that fitting places should be provided for that purpose. He urged also that the people attend the services, saying that the synagogue would amount to little if the services were not attended. He felt that the synagogue should be consecrated not only to Jewish worship and the training of the children, but as a place where Jew can meet Jew to rejoice and cry together, a place where Jewish consciousness can be developed. The singing of "O Canada" preceded a brief address by Mayor Jacob Smith, who presented to Mr. Burger the silver key, a memento of his purchase of the key unlocking the front door of the handsome edifice. The bearers of the Torah then proceeded into the synagogue, as the band played a march, the crowd following, filling the synagogue to capacity. Inside the synagogue the privilege of lighting the lamps was sold to R. J. Hoffman; the Torah was placed in the ark and the presentation of the Orem Kodesh (the ark) was made by the local Hebrew Ladies' Aid Society. At the evening service, the mayor, members of the council and county officials sat in a body at the front of the church. R. J. Hoffman was chairman, while Prof. Moses Jung, Professor of Jewish Culture at the University of Illinois, was the speaker. Committee: Chairman, R. J. Hoffman; procession director, J. Cooperman; treasurers, J. Levine, O. Taube; financial secretary, Chas. Greenberg; publicity, H. Katzman; music, I. Zirinsky; ceremonies, Rev. I. Richman, P. Ginsberg, M. Morris; reception, A. Newman, D. Ubberman, J. Friedman; refreshment, Mrs. Morris, Mrs. Zalavansky, Messrs. H. Rubin, Zett, H. Friedman, H. Rosenburg.

Life's Tragedies

By I. L. BRILL

I

If you were to read the stories I have to tell in a book of fiction, you would marvel at the ingenuity of the writer and congratulate him upon having so imaginative and fertile a mind. But you know the old adage, "Truth is stranger than fiction." And what I am about to relate is not the product of my own brain or imagination, but is taken from the Book of Life which is open to be read by all who have observant eyes.

"Bril, telegram! Bril, telegram!"

I rushed to the door, opened it, and there stood a little man garbed in a Western Union messenger's uniform. He stepped into the room and there he was. A little over five feet in height. An iron-gray beard surrounded an oval face. From underneath thick eyebrows there peered forth sharp eyes. He looked stocky. If anybody had told me that the "messenger boy" was sixty-six, I would have laughed.

I saw him rushing through the streets of Harlem delivering his messages. He soon changed to night duty. Perhaps he was ashamed that people should see him by the glare of the sunlight. For behind this messenger boy there was a story. He is dead now; passed away a few months ago.

One night last winter he brought a message and I asked him in to warm himself a little. It was a bitter cold night. I discovered that here was a man of education. He spoke and read several languages; he was an expert accountant. He was, too, well versed in Hebrew lore. Why then a "messenger boy"? And here is the story:

The "messenger boy" was born in old Courland, of good family, aye of people that had even produced noted men. He received an excellent education, not only in Hebrew, but secular as well. He was studious and of good mind and so in addition to Russian he learned German and French and he could speak Hebrew. Religious he wasn't over much.

He fell in love with a girl, a winsome maid, and, both being free in thought, took up life together without going through any marriage ceremony. The couple came to America. Two children, boys, were born to them.

The boys grew up until one was about thirteen and then the mother "got religion" and she converted herself and her two boys to Christianity. The husband and father left them. He went to live in another city.

The younger of the two boys was a sensitive little chap. And so one day when he had passed his fifteenth birthday, his dead body was found in a river near the city where his brother and mother lived. The father was sent for and seeing the body surrounded by all the symbols of the church, he fainted away. He stayed for the funeral. But soon after he went back to Russia. He went to his brothers in old St. Petersburg who received him with open arms and he prospered. All would have been well with him. But there was a tug at his heart. He wanted to see his son, the one still living. And thus he came back to America. His boy was no longer a Jew. He was by this time a grown-up man, had married and had children of his own. But neither he nor his wife nor his offspring were Jews.

The son had become a stranger to the father.

The relatives of my "messenger boy" were perfectly willing to provide for him. But he was proud and so, during the war when boys were scarce, he got a job at the Western Union. And because the manager liked the old man he wasn't fired.

For nearly ten years he delivered messages. He never complained. Rarely he would take a day off. But when he did, he would dress himself up and appear for a little while his old self, his real self, the man of education, the man of culture.

And he was taken sick and died. There came his wife and his son and his son's wife and their children. The old man was buried according to Jewish custom.

For twenty years the woman and the man had not met. And when they did at last, he could speak no longer.

Oh the tragedy of life!

II

High on his wagon he sits, bespectacled, looking more like a teacher than a collector of rags, papers, old bottles and rusted iron.

And he goes through town from early morn until dusk, and sometimes even after the shadows of night have fallen, gathering up things others no longer want.

He's a junk peddler. And the boys laugh at him. And even his fellow-Jews say: "You must know how to talk to him."

Sure you must know how to talk to him. He is no ordinary junk peddler. He is a scholar.

One day, while visiting some friends, he noticed the daughter of the house, a high school girl, struggling with some problem in mathematics.

Said he to her: "Let me see what you are doing."

Replied the girl, with that cocksureness of the American school girl or boy: "What do you know about it?"

Very modestly he begged: "Just let me try."

"Go ahead then," she condescended.

He busied himself with pencil and paper and after a short while said to the girl: "There, it's done."

The girl's eyes fairly bulged out. But she wasn't sure yet.

"You show it to your teacher," he advised.

And to be sure, the answer to the problem was correct.

Another day he detected a mistake the teacher had made in translating a Latin sentence. He showed it to his wife and she laughed. "These American teachers; what do they know?" she scornfully scoffed.

By this time I had become interested in my junk peddler and his wife.

Loose Leaf Devices and Supplies

They were both products of the Russian gymnasium.

How they ever managed to get into the country is a miracle to me. But that Jewish persistence, that Jewish stubbornness and that Jewish pluck manage to do things that would otherwise be impossible.

They met whilst still in school. He wanted to go to a university and she, too, was anxious to continue her studies. But Russia didn't want any educated Jews or, at best, she wanted only a few of them.

The two married and decided to come to this land of opportunity and there start life all over again.

How those two suffered! He didn't want to go into the "shop," didn't care to be an operator as his friends advised him. And in that his wife seconded him. Meanwhile a child was coming and a living had to be made.

He didn't like the big city. So the little family moved to a country town. Wide open spaces all around, a little house and maybe a little garden where babies could play.

His knowledge of English was not very extensive. Supposing he could speak German and French and Russian? What of it that he knew Latin and Greek and knew more of higher mathamatics than the American school marm? He was a foreigner, an alien and a non-Nordic to boot.

But he and his wife and the little babe had to live. And so he got himself a horse and wagon and entered upon his career of a junk peddler.

His wife comforted him. "It will only be for a little while. You will make money!"

Oh, the hopes that are never realized!

And then a second babe came into the household.

For nine long years he has been going through the town collecting the castaway things of his neighbors.

Look at him and through his glasses there stare at you such sad eyes!

What hopes he had! What dreams his wife had! And there he is—the "Jew junk peddler."

He doesn't care any more. With the exception of visiting one or two families he goes nowhere. Yes, once a year, on Rosh Hashonah and Yom Kippur, he turns up at shul. He pays for his seats, located somewhere in a corner, where he and his wife sit. Round about him are men less intellectual than he who had made fortunes; and he, the man of knowledge and of culture, traverses the towns and shouts: "I buy rags."—The Daily Jewish News.

AMERICAN RABBI ELECTED MEMBER OF TEL-AVIV CITY COUNCIL

Rabbi Samuel Benjamin, formerly of Cleveland, was elected a member of the Tel-Aviv City Council. Tel-Aviv, a city in close proximity to the ancient port of Jaffa, was founded only fifteen years ago by thirty Jewish pioneers. It now has a population of 40,000, and is a beautiful modern city with all the conveniences and improvements to be found in the most civilized American and European communities. In the recent elections over 13,000 voters participated. Rabbi Samuel Benjamin headed the ticket of the Orthodox National Party.

Rabbi Benjamin came to Tel-Aviv from Cleveland, Ohio, where he was the spiritual leader of the Jewish Centre and Obeb Zedek Congregation. He is a graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary of New York.

that while those two automobiles were sold at a loss because they would not run, he had discovered that certain parts of the machines were good enough to use in other cars. It would be poor business, he thought, to break the machines up for mere junk.

"Right there," said he, "I decided to buy old automobiles and set up a 'graveyard,' where the good parts of old cars could be sold.

"The next day I got busy and borrowed a little money. I fixed up a small shack on the Lincoln Highway, about fifteen miles east of Lancaster. I leased a small field and then began to buy second-hand cars. Pretty soon the field was filled with wrecks, and I had to get more space. To-day there are more than three hundred automobiles in my field.

"Some people gave me their second-hand cars. They were glad to get rid of them. As soon as we receive a car, we look over it. If it's not fit to run, we strip it, file the good parts away, and wait for calls for those parts.

"Two years after I started, I opened a place in Lancaster and called it an automobile exchange. At this place there are several hundred machines stored, together with thousands of parts, arranged for quick delivery to all parts of the country.

"Then the idea came to me to handle not only used parts of automobiles, but to open a place where new parts of machines could be bought on short notice. I bought some property in the central section of the city and turned it into a sort of jobbing house, where new parts would be handled. This building we called 'The House of Million Parts.'"

Roseman was born in Russia, fifty-five years ago and came to this country when three years of age. When a boy, he sold pretzels and matches on the streets of Lancaster. All of his six children attend the Lancaster schools, with the exception of his daughter Vivian, who assists her father in the office.—Robert H. Denehey, in The American Magazine.

MRS. RICHARD GOTTHEIL DEEPLY IMPRESSED BY "WONDERFUL WORK IN PALESTINE"

New York.—Mrs. Simon Rothenberg, acting president of the Keren Hayesod Women's League, has received a message from Mrs. Richard Gottheil, the president, for the members of the organization, giving Mrs. Gottheil's impressions of her observations in Palestine and especially of the dedication of the Hebrew University.

"When one considers," writes Mrs. Gottehil, "how little sacrifice the Jewish people in the Diaspora have brought towards those achievements, one wonders that so much has been accomplished."

Mrs. Gottheil's message states further: "I leave Palestine with my heart filled with thankfulness for the wonderful work that has been achieved in Eretz Israel by the Keren Hayesod and the Keren Kayemeth, and especially for the work done by the Chaluzim and Chaluzoth.

"When I return to America I will tell American Jewry of my experiences in the land of Israel, and I will ask them through united efforts to hasten the hour of our true redemption."
